"In my entire career I've never seen anything like this, and that's quite the understatement," said Ben Gomes, lead search strategist on Google's Social Networking project. "It's kind of the holy grail. That's like going to the moon. It's incredible what they've done. It's so much more than just a tool." Google's research arm has been working for a year on an automated system, which has already helped Google crack a major case of identity theft. The system, which engineers call the "Googlebot," automatically searches the Internet looking for information on people, in an effort to track down previous identities. So far the search engine giant says it has uncovered records on nearly 50 million stolen identities. It's a search engine specifically designed to bypass privacy barriers that make it difficult for search companies to track down user information. While others, such as Microsoft, have tried unsuccessfully to create web browsers that don't invade privacy, Google has gone a step further. It developed a web browser, dubbed the Googlebot, which sifts through the billions of search queries that Google's servers make every day. "They've created an incredible capacity to find this kind of information," said Gomes. Google's bots are so powerful that at least two other companies have already launched tools to try to track down stolen identities. But Google has a vast network of servers at its fingertips that no one else can match. "So what we're doing is basically we're going through the search index, which is the index of all the pages that Google has crawled," Gomes said. "Every single web page that's on the Internet, we're going through and trying to find out, has somebody in there with the name you gave us?"
